Thoughts In Solitude

Much of life is lived in the valley, but for each of us there are special moments. T. S. Eliot speaks about time being "made through that moment," or "the point of intersection of the timeless." Kelty says that at least once in a lifetime, one's entire life is dependent on a moment. It is often only later that one understands that all other moments were preparation for this moment, from which one's meaning flows. On such moments, one risks one's life. Almost all saints share that timeless moment into and from which their meaningful time flowed. The popularity of the camera rests in the desire to halt time by containing it in a special moment. So it is that Christianity rests on a powerful sense of memory.

The life of Moses serves as an example. His powerful moment occurred in Egypt when he saw a Hebrew slave being beaten. In a moment, his instant response was anger sufficient to kill the Egyptian and bury him in the sand. How long would that take? Perhaps half an hour? Probably less. But he was captured by that moment, and while he tried to run from that moment, he couldn't, for he was branded. Thus he spent the rest of his life seeking liberation for his people. And what was the end, which flowed back to give meaning to the whole? It was when God led Moses to a mountain. It was there that he caught a glimpse of the Promised Land, the goal to which these many years had been dedicated. But he himself would never enter that land. With tear-streaked eyes, how long could he endure the pain of looking? Perhaps half an hour? Here we have the life of one of the great ones, whose life flowed from two events of "timeless time" that totaled less than one hour in length but that had infinite depth.

The "present" is a timeless moment, an invisible line between past and future. This present has the power to redeem the past and the wisdom to discern the novelty impinging from the future. This capacity helps us understand why many of the saints regarded "contemplation" as the highest form of spirituality. An aid in becoming contemplative is repeating continuously a word or phrase (mantra) as a way to empty the mind of both past and future. It is a process of slowing, saying the mantra only as fast as one needs in order to keep the mind occupied. And as the slowing continues, it moves toward a timeless moment, and one's soul is centered at rest. This moment is invaded by the thundering of silence, as one is interpenetrated in the "Nothingness" of a contentless "now." While time and thought are ingredients of the "flow" of time, here in the "now" is a feeling that is warm, intense, and full.

Such centering not only can give birth to a calm center (soul), but it can establish a lifestyle in which a person can be intensely focused in the here and now, whatever one is doing. One can sense such a centered person, identifiable by an openness to otherness. Contemplative persons invite what is "now before them" to enter them so they are absorbed by it — for example, a flower, tree, or another person. What happens is a profound mutuality, an immersion. Here it is that life becomes an openness to the world's speaking out, whether in crying out, calling out, singing out, or hoping forth.

This timeless present is living in the tension between memory and vision. And the way this is done renders each person unique, just as Scripture testifies that each "star differs from star in glory" (1 Cor. 15:41). Christian hermits, in attempting to be God-like, attempt to stay only in the present moment, as does God. In being neither past nor future, one lives, at least in foretaste, the immensity of the eternal. My spiritual director lives in this way — for hours on end he remains in the presence of God. His way of expressing time is, "I'm just passing through." His description of me is that I become immersed in everything along the path. Hopefully there is a place for both of us in approaching time.

From: A SEASON IN THE DESERT, MAKING TIME HOLY
Fr. W. Paul Jones,
Pittsburg, MO

The “word” for this time of the year is New Life! We, in the northern hemisphere, have just to look outside the window to see New Life burgeoning forth in nature. Here at Still Wood, we have been watching a cloud of delicate green creeping up the slopes across the valley. It is amazing to see how much difference a few hundred feet in elevation can mean. We trekked up the logging road behind our house a few weeks ago with Neill and Cynda capering around us. Plants which were already in full bloom at home like trilliums, wild geraniums and purple valerian weren’t even visible when we reached the four thousand foot level. Instead, we discovered a re-run of wild flowers and blossoming shrubs which had already had their day at our house, offering us an extension of spring’s beauty!

It reminds us that nothing is “out of season” – that somewhere in the world spring is always springing, the sun is always rising, and a hermit is always praising the Lord. Nothing is ever really ended; life is always beginning. Living in conscious awareness of this can keep us from being trapped in a rigid “either/or” mindset, or tensing up under the burden of “now or never.” It is always Now. It is always “both/and.” What a fresh vision!

We try to foster this vision in the pages of Raven’s Bread where everyone’s insights and experiences are welcome. In a world where many define themselves by who they are not and what they are against, we wish to dwell on who we are, and what we are for.

We are for silence, solitude and simplicity in the multiple styles in which these can be lived and expressed. Whether Buddhist or Anglican, Taoist, or Roman Catholic, or none of the above...we can still be living a life with genuine hermit values at the core. By gathering together these such different expressions of shared values, like so many wildflowers in spring, the image of hermit life grows richer, more aromatic, more colorful. It becomes a mosaic, alive with multiple designs. Just consider the various ways of praying the Liturgy of the Hours submitted to this issue. What a treasure from which to draw for our personal lives!

We welcome and applaud all of you who write into Raven’s Bread to share your insights and experiences. Thanks to you, RB is recognized as a leading voice speaking for genuine contemporary eremitic life. As editors, we choose to limit our own reflections in order to feature your insights, your stories, and your contributions on the growing phenomenon of hermit life.

We are still surprised by the frequency of phone calls or emails from the media wanting to know more about contemporary hermit life. They say they’ve been told to contact Raven’s Bread Ministries if they wish to get the “real story.” We share what we can always adding that our mailing list is confidential. More than once we have turned away journalists wanting a list of hermits living in a particular area. They would have to do their own research if they wanted names. We willingly share the treasure, but not the identity of the miners.

Recently a writer impressed us stating that he intended to write an article about the “real hermit” of the twenty-first century, not the caricature of the bearded old man peering out of his cave. We were pleased to help him see how eremical life is blooming anew in a world which sorely needs such hidden souls whose prayers provide the “glue” that holds humanity together in love. Spring is everywhere; the sun is always rising; and hermits are an ever new story. Look for the latest in the Saturday Evening Post this summer!

*With grateful love,
Karen & Paul*

Hermits Up Front and Personal

We have taken vows to live as hermits following a long period of growing into a more solitary life together. We look back on ten years during which we have been taking incremental steps toward where we are now—slowly disappearing into a life of prayer and labor, ora et labora, as St. Benedict calls it, not in denial of the church or the world but more in acceptance and celebration of our true nature, becoming increasingly more sensitive to the pain and suffering in the world and to the pain of division and lack of courage and compassion within the church, of which we are all guilty.

Although we have taken vows to live as hermits, spending 3 to 3 1/2 hours each day in prayer and reflective reading/meditation, and our daily labor is varied, from ground and building maintenance, and growing vegetables to the normal cooking, cleaning and other domestic chores, we also offer a ministry of intercessory prayer. Our Rule of Life includes practical service to others as well: we support financially a number of church and other organizations that address poverty, injustice and environmental concerns. Ian is available for part-time locum ministry in Anglican church communities in addition to preaching and retreat engagements. Margaret provides a weekly meal for an elderly neighbor and makes up food parcels from garden and preserves. We go to town to shop and bank, etc., returning to our hermitage exhausted from all the noise, the overlit shopping plaza and the crowds of people. And oh, what bliss, we are not connected to the internet. We don't even have a computer, an ipod, or blackberry—except in the paddock! We speak to people personally on the telephone and write letters. We keep informed by reading the local paper and watching evening news.

So there you have it. We are striving to live a balanced life of work and prayer, in tune with the natural rhythms of each day and the yearly seasonal cycles, engaged in, as Thomas Merton says, “the slow heart work of seeking God.” It is no better than anyone else’s ministry, just different and away from mainstream church and community—on the margins. We are on a journey of simplifying, slowing down and moving into greater and deeper silence, answering a call “to share in the profound solitude of God, in the depths of the mystery of God’s being” (Eve Baker).

*Lord remember me,
As you do the nearby landscape,
swaying, praying: arbor vitae,
when you come into your kingdom.
Birds fly by, play on the wind.
Abba—can I say that? —Lord
remember me.
Cotton puff clouds, fill the sky, blue —
your kingdom.
Wordless prayer, bends into a liturgy,
Divine—the great present
now here—yet where?
Your kingdom come.
Holy the Immortal One, Holy the Mighty One,
Holy the Mystery.
Lord remember me.*

The Zion Hermit-Monks of Mount Carmel
P. O. Box 222
Bowie, AZ 85605

The monks are an independent non-profit organization not affiliated with the Catholic Diocese of Tucson consisting of two priests who switched to hermitage life about forty years ago. The Carmelites know of them but their spiritual mentor for this life-style is a former French priest known as Abshicktananda, so the "flavor" of their lifestyle is more Eastern.

CELEBRATING TIME ALONE, Stories of Splendid Solitude by Lionel Fisher.

For six years, the author lived alone on a remote Pacific Northwest beach, where he had ample time to reflect on using solitude to become a happier, more fulfilled person. In a writing style at once eloquent and down to earth, Fisher interweaves his own experiences with the stories of others to affirm the life-changing benefits of being alone.

STILLNESS, DAILY GIFTS OF SOLITUDE by Richard Mahler.

Mahler spent ninety days totally alone as caretaker of a mountain ranch with no electricity, a wood stove and short wave radio for emergencies. From the diary of those days, he has fashioned a book that is part memoir, part adventure story, part spiritual reflection and part self-help on how we can incorporate silence and solitude into our daily lives.
